Faculty Leader

Eóin O'Donoghue is assistant professor of Classical and Early Mediterranean Studies at Brandeis. His research includes the archaeology and material culture of the ancient Mediterranean, with a focus on the Central Mediterranean and island archaeology.

Professor O'Donoghue is interested in questions of social and gender identities in the past and how we can use material evidence to better understand ancient societies. Professor O'Donoghue is also a field archaeologist. Since 2009, he has worked on the Poggio Civitate Excavation Project, an investigation of an Etruscan settlement south of Siena. In 2015, he started working with the Pantelleria Project on the excavation of a Punic and Roman sanctuary site on the island of Pantelleria. He is also a book review editor for the Ancient West & East journal, devoted to the study of the periphery of the ancient world.
